Leatherback Turtles

All over the world, the species of sea turtles are endangered. Endangered means that there are very few left, so they may become extinct.

The leatherback is the largest sea turtle and can grow to be about 2 meters long. The turtle's basic diet is jellyfish, although it eats fish and other sea creatures. They are born on land but live their lives in water. The male leatherbacks never return to land after they are born and the females only return to lay eggs.

There are many reasons why the leatherbacks have become endangered. One cause of endangerment is that many humans and animals think they are a delicious food. Another reason is that humans hunt the adult sea turtles all over the world because they use their skin to make bags and clothes.

More and more, people are using the beaches where sea turtles lay eggs; as a result they lose their habitat. Also the sea turtles are easily disturbed because of the noise and the lights. Another cause is irresponsible fishing. Fishermen often catch sea turtles in their nets so the turtles drown when that happens.

Finally, pollution in the oceans kills many turtles every year. Turtles confuse floating plastic garbage with jellyfish and eat the garbage. But they can't digest the garbage so they die.
